All Dogs Go to Heaven with a Vengeance (Electric Literature's Recommended Reading) John Thorson
In John Thorson's "All Dogs Go to Heaven with a Vengeance," the narrator has been assigned his best friend Darren not by any outside authority, but by all the parts of his personality he would hide and deny: his love for etched battleaxes, for Tolkien, and for howling at the moon. The guilelessness with which the narrator dismisses Darren is shocking, but honest: "I don't like ditching Darren, but I don't want to hurt his feelings. Darren is ugly. He's a pervert. He has little eyes and his lips are scarred from a repaired cleft and his body has a weird shape like a Tyrannosaurus rex." The friends that the narrator would choose, if it were that easy, are a group of (probably) good-looking, unsupervised beer drinkers, who live in large houses with furnished basements. People who don't embarrass themselves during Movie Charades, for example. This group is decidedly unlike the narrator, which is precisely why he gravitates toward them—the reflection he sees in Darren is not one he is willing to accept. - Halimah Marcus, Editor-in-Chief, Electric Literature's Recommended Reading.
