Los nueve libros de la historia (Spanish Edition) Herodoto

La gente más culta de Persia y mejor instruida en la historia, pretende que los fenicios fueron los autores primitivos de todas las discordias que se suscitaron entre los griegos y las demás naciones. Habiendo aquellos venido del mar Eritreo al nuestro, se establecieron en la misma región que hoy ocupan, y se dieron desde luego al comercio en sus largas navegaciones. Cargadas sus naves de géneros propios del Egipto y de la Asiria, uno de los muchos y diferentes lugares donde aportaron traficando fue la ciudad de Argos, la principal y más sobresaliente de todas las que tenía entonces aquella región que ahora llamamos Helada. Los negociantes fenicios, desembarcando sus mercaderías, las expusieron con orden a pública venta. Entre las mujeres que en gran número concurrieron a la playa, fue una la joven Io, hija de Inacho, rey de Argos, a la cual dan los persas el mismo nombre que los griegos. Al quinto o sexto día de la llegada de los extranjeros, despachada la mayor parte de sus géneros y hallándose las mujeres cercanas a la popa, después de haber comprado cada una lo que más excitaba sus deseos, concibieron y ejecutaron los fenicios el pensamiento de robarlas. En efecto, exhortándose unos a otros, arremetieron contra todas ellas, y si bien la mayor parte se les pudo escapar, no cupo esta suerte a la princesa, que arrebatada con otras, fue metida en la nave y llevada después al Egipto, para donde se hicieron luego a la vela.
