The manager could not comprehend the Brigadeführer's irregular request when he stated that his men were at the bank to remove the hundreds of gold bars stacked in the vault. With a cocked pistol pressing against his forehead, the manager saw no need to require the Brigadeführer to produce an official, signed order from a higher authority. The identities of the enlisted men were never ascertained. Because of his collar and sleeve insignia on his battle smock, only the Brigadeführer's rank was certain. And because each gold bar bears the stamped eagle and swastika of Nazi Germany, the heist-so farfetched that it became an urban legend-is referred to as "eagle's gold," and not a fleck has been recovered. Where the gold was stashed has never been determined. Until now. . .
