When the past bites you in the ass it's hard to shake. Especially when you're trying to run from it but you're holding on to it, it becomes a difficult beast to tame. Alicia Marshall is at the peak of her prime when entering the world of new money but all is not well in the land of wealth. While only dealing with minor changes, the ghetto of Detroit pulled her back in and she wakes up in an angry and heartbreaking fit, and seeks her revenge for those who attacked her.

That's only the tip of the ice burg with Broderick holding his head low and needing Alicia to be the friend that he knows she can be when his past creeps up on him and he's forced to be an adult for a change. But while these newly found feelings arise in the wake of tragedy, Broderick makes the wrong choice and confuses Alicia altogether.

Enters Adrian, or as his friends call him "Bart". With their science experiment over he feeds off of Alicia's vulnerability when inviting her to the south of France for Spring Break. That in itself opened up a different sector of her heart that she hadn't known was there, and it lets off round after round of doubting events that makes her question herself and her position entirely.

It seems as though as soon as she's complacent, something has to pull her back in and people are falling at her feet who need her. She finds herself torn between Adrian's doings and needing to help Broderick to better himself, all until she's slapped with the media and is forced to see something about Adrian that she had no idea actually happened.

Oh how far she's come from the slums, but the only thing that's different from the struggle she once endured is the figures in her bank account. She realizes that money is not what keeps you safe but it hurts more than struggling. No one is safe from darkness.
